Violins of Hope

A Month-Long Series of Concerts and Exhibitions
A Year-Long Art Education Program

Violinists Itzhak Perlman and Pinchas Zukerman—Two International Stars with Close Ties to Violins of Hope to Perform in Advance at The Soraya

March 22 to April 30, 2020

(Los Angeles, CA, February 25, 2019) Four symphonic orchestras, a major heritage museum and one of Los Angeles’ leading performing arts centers will join forces in 2020 for an ambitious collaborative initiative that will bring to life the sounds of music once lost.

Violins of Hope is an internationally renowned project created to celebrate the triumph of the human spirit. At the heart of Violins of Hope is a collection of over 60 stringed instruments rescued from the Holocaust and restored by second-generation violinmaker, Amnon Weinstein, and his son, Avshalom in their shop in Tel Aviv.

Now, this unique collection will come to Los Angeles for the first time March 22 to April 26, 2020 for a month-long series of concerts, exhibits, and student educational programming at several Los Angeles cultural institutions. Each concert in the Violins of Hope series will feature performers and soloists using instruments from the Weinstein’s collection. Artist in Residence and Northridge native Niv Ashkenazi, the only individual musician in North American entrusted with one of the collection’s rescued violins, will take the storied instruments on a tour to Los Angeles area schools.

“The violin is alive, is existing, and is going to talk to all the world. Each violin like that you are going to play, it’s for millions of people that are dead. That is victory. And each concert is victory!” said Amnon Weinstein.
Susanne Reyto is the Chair of Violins of Hope, Los Angeles County and is responsible for working with Weinstein to bring the violins to the regions.

“With three generations born since the end of the Holocaust, how do we keep alive the memories of those who perished? Each instrument of the Violins of Hope shares a common past from this chapter in human history, but more so, each violin embodies a personal story,” said Thor Steingraber, Executive Director of The Soraya. “Some were once played on the streets in the hands of klezmer musicians, and some held pedigrees in world-class concert halls. To experience firsthand their resonance, musical and historical alike, creates an immediate connection to our collective past.”

Violins of Hope has been featured in the documentary, Violins of Hope: Strings of the Holocaust, and a book Violins of Hope: Violins of the Holocaust—Instruments of Hope and Liberation in Mankind’s Darkest Hour

In the spring of 2017, Steingraber launched the “Music Knows No Borders” series which shines a light on musicians and cultures form around the world. Since the program’s inception, The Soraya has presented artists from 28 nations. Leading up to the Violins of Hope program, The Soraya will host world-renowned violinists Itzhak Perlman and Pinchas Zukerman, both of whom have ties to the Weinstein Violin Shop in Tel Aviv.

Steingraber concluded, “Come hear them and see the violins firsthand. Experience their resonance, musical and historical alike. Make a direct and immediate connection to those who once played them. Regard them as powerful symbols, as emblems of perseverance, as sources of reflection, and as reminders of compassion and empathy. The violins stand as a tangible connection to our past, and their stories reach across the generations and demand of us Never Again.”

About Violins of Hope Educational Programs and Artist in Residence Niv Ashkenazi

The Los Angeles area concerts are accompanied by school visits, where the history of some instruments – such as the violin thrown out of a cattle train on way from France to Auschwitz, the violin that was buried under the snow in Holland, and the violin that saved lives of people who played in camp orchestra and survived – is told against the larger history of World War II.

The Soraya Arts Education Program serves 10,000 area schoolchildren in grades K-12, as well as CSUN’s 40,000 students annually. Through this program, Violins of Hope ambassadors including Artist in Residence and Northridge resident Niv Ashkenazi, the only individual musician in North America entrusted with one of the collection’s rescued violins, will take the storied instruments “on tour” to visit local students.

Classical violinist and former student of Itzhak Perlman, Ashkenazi will share the Violins of Hope program with students in the San Fernando Valley in over 40 in-school visits and a culminating concert for students at The Soraya. His recent engagements have featured a performance and speaking engagement at the Jewish Funders Network Conference and toured Israel with the iPalpiti Chamber Orchestra. In addition to performing and teaching in Los Angeles, Ashkenazi serves on the professional advisory board of Shane’s Inspiration, a global non-profit organization dedicated to building inclusive playgrounds and served on the board of the Los Angeles youth Orchestra. Since 2012, Ashkenazi has been the arranger and featured soloist for TranscenDanceGroup’s multimedia show G*D.

Violins of Hope Founders: the Weinstein Family

81 years ago, Moshe Weinstein and his wife, Golda, moved to Tel Aviv and opened a violin shop. They had both graduated from the Vilna conservatory, Moshe as a violinist and Golda as a pianist, and followed the large Jewish emigration from Europe to Palestine.

In postwar Europe, survivors of the Holocaust — remnants of the continent’s once rich and thriving Jewish communities — poured out of liberated concentration camps, work camps, displaced-persons camps. Some made their way to British Mandate Palestine and what would soon become the new, modern Jewish state of Israel. Many made their way to our shores in the United States, Canada, Latin America. Countless more remained locked behind the Iron Curtain as the Cold War settled across the globe.

Amid the human destruction and displacement, the treasures of the Jewish people also were displaced. The sacred — Torah scrolls, prayer shawls and other ritual items — but in even greater numbers, the artistic and musical treasures sacred to Jewish culture throughout Europe. The Nazis burned, smashed, looted and confiscated the possessions of millions. But some precious pieces remained. Many musical instruments survived when their owners did not. Many more were lost or abandoned as their owners escaped the war. And when the Allies liberated Europe in 1945, hope remained. For Moshe and Golda’s son, Amnon Weinstein, that hope manifested in the thin wooden bodies of violins, violas and cellos rescued from the Holocaust.

Amnon and his son, Avshalom, created Violins of Hope to celebrate the triumph of the human spirit. Using their private collection of over 60 violins, violas, and cellos all restored since the end of World War II, the Weinsteins continue to tell the story of the instruments’ previous owners, each with their own personal stories from the Holocaust.

Weinstein is the subject of the documentaries Le Voyage d’ Amnon; Violins in War Time; Orchestra in Exile a documentary about Bronislav Hubermann and the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.
Violins of Hope Background
In 1938, Moshe Weinstein fled the spreading upheaval in pre-War Europe, armed with his precious skills as a violin-maker. He sought refuge in a small town that had yet to blossom into a city, opening his family-run business on a small dirt road. As Tel Aviv grew, so did the Weinstein violin shop, becoming an integral part of the city’s burgeoning cultural haven for refugee musicians.

In 1985, a single instrument was brought to the shop for repair. When Moshe’s son, Amnon, took it apart, he uncovered the violin’s direct connection to Auschwitz, the concentration camp that claimed more than 1 million lives. Thirty years later, Violins of Hope has grown to more than sixty violins, each with its own story -- some were recovered from concentration camps, and some were hidden for years, some were once played on the streets by klezmer musicians, and some had pedigrees in world class concert halls.

Mentioned throughout the Holy texts, musical instruments, especially the string instruments that were the violin’s predecessor, were exalted. Beginning in the Renaissance, Jewish violin players made their mark. And in the centuries since, the violin accompanied the Jewish people into exile. These prized possessions were not purveyors of music alone. They carried the collective memory of a people, and brought cultural influence throughout the globe. This was never truer than during the Holocaust.

The Weinstein’s violin shop was founded in Tel Aviv by Amnon’s father, Moshe, in 1939, a decade before the establishment of the state of Israel. Before the Weinsteins began collecting “refugee” violins from the Shoah, the Holocaust, Moshe was the luthier for the Palestinian Philharmonic, and provided many of the instruments to the orchestra that saved so many Jewish lives. By the 21st century, Amnon Weinstein and his son, Avshalom had procured and restored more than 60 violins, violas and cellos, calling their collection Violins of Hope.
